

An astonishing discovery in 1966

In 1966, a polygraph expert named Cleve Backster connected a houseplant to a lie detector machine just to see if it could measure the way water travelled up through its leaves.

What happened instead changed the direction of his entire life.

The plant didn't just respond to water...

It responded to his thoughts, his intentions, his emotions, as if something inside it was quietly paying attention the whole time.

But the part that truly shook him came later.

The plant could sense when he was planning to come home...

Not when he walked through the door, but from 15 miles away, before he ever left.

He spent the next several decades running hundreds of experiments trying to understand what he'd found...

And again and again, the plants responded to human consciousness in ways that had no scientific explanation.

Mainstream science has done its best to look the other way.

But here's what I keep coming back to...

God didn't create a dead universe.

Life was breathed into every living thing.

And what Backster discovered might just be the smallest glimpse of how deep that connection runs between us and creation.

Read Backster's research and see if you can find a way to explain away what he found →

*To your connection with creation,
Nadia Willis*